Monday, February 24 (12:00 - 1:30 PM, Central Library Community Room):
"TAing to Thousands" is a panel of teaching assistants drawn from Vanderbilt’s Coursera-hosted massive open online courses to date. #TeachTo1000s, #VanderbiltU

- Panelists will overview their activities as part of a massive open online course (MOOC) that thousands of students participated in and completed, including
  - course prep (both technical and instructional design),
  - on-camera time,
  - answering forum posts,
  - being part of online office hours that were attended by 100s of students from across the globe, as well as Vanderbilt students

- Panelists may talk about their assessments of the quality of the learning and teaching experience, and very particularly, what they learned from the experience about teaching, culture, communication, and technology.
  - Some panelists may discuss research on their MOOCs, be it in educational data mining, cultural accommodation, or any one of many other possibilities.
  - Panelists may address ways that MOOCs could be used to enhance on campus education. Would they do things differently the next time? Do they have broader recommendations?

The purpose of the panel is to introduce Vanderbilt community members to MOOCs through the eyes of those in the next generation of teaching, research, social activism, and entrepreneurship. There will be plenty of time for Q&A.

This panel is co-sponsored by the Vanderbilt’s Center for Teaching, Graduate School, Jean and Alexander Heard Library, and the Vanderbilt Institute for Digital Learning.
