has launched a new program to train students on how to use the university's Freedom of Expression policy in an academic context and a new Web portal for students to seek help with issues related to freedom of speech.

The program, called Directions Fellowship, is a new initiative funded by the Mellon Foundation to help students navigate the challenges of freedom of expression and engage in meaningful conversations around the topics of race, politics, and other sensitive issues.

Kimberly Welch, a graduate student in the Department of English, was awarded the first Directions Fellowship. She is using the fellowship to research and write about the legacy of Yusef A. Lateef, a jazz musician known for his contributions to the field.

Vanderbilt has updated its Freedom of Expression policy in an effort to clarify the university's stance on various forms of expression, including hate speech.

The policy now states that Vanderbilt is committed to ensuring that all students, faculty, and staff have the right to express their thoughts and ideas, as long as they do so in a respectful and non-disruptive manner. The policy also states that the university will not tolerate hate speech or behavior that undermines the dignity of individuals or groups.
