Legalizing marijuana fails to solve problems in Uruguay

Wednesday, March 11

Legalizing marijuana fails to solve problems in Uruguay

Posted by Isabel Gamarra × 02/25/2015 at 2:00 pm
Youngsters wait outside the Parliament building (background) in Montevideo while lawmakers debate the bill legalizing marijuana. Photo by Pablo Bielli, AFP/Getty Images.

One year after the legalization of marijuana in Uruguay, a study has found that 70 percent of Uruguayans feel that public safety and public health conditions after the legalization will either worsen or remain the same.

The data was released today as part of a preliminary report conducted by researchers at the Latin American and Caribbean Center at Florida International University and Universidad Catolica de Uruguay as part of the Latin American Marijuana Research Initiative (LAMRI).

In addition, the study found that consumption and risk behaviors, particularly among younger adults, have increased, and that marijuana users have failed to register as required by the law.

“These results show that Uruguay faces challenges when it comes to this piece of legislation,” said Jose Miguel Cruz, research director at LACC. “While the law received little resistance when it was enacted, the general public remains skeptical of the law and its repercussions on society.”

The study holds lessons for lawmakers in the United States, where the District of Columbia and 27 states have decriminalized marijuana to some degree. According to the Americas Barometer, 51.5 percent of U.S. citizens approve of legalizing marijuana.

“The results of this study demonstrate the rocky road ahead for the region with regard to the legalization of marijuana,” said Frank Mora, director of LACC. “This is just one example of how research from LACC has implications for policy-making decisions throughout the Americas.”

In 2013, Uruguay became the first country in the world to regulate the possession, growth, and distribution of cannabis. The initiative of marijuana regulation by President José Mujica, was passed by the Uruguayan Congress and signed into law by the president in December 2013.
LAMRI is the first to examine the impact of marijuana regulation in this Latin American country and its influence across the hemisphere. The full report is expected to be completed by May 2015.

For a copy of the report please, click here.

If you're new here, you may want to subscribe to our newsletter. Thanks for visiting!

Tags: College of Arts & Sciences × Jose Miguel Cruz × Latin American and Caribbean Center × Politics and International Relations × Research × School of International and Public Affairs (SIPA)

Profile

Sign in with Twitter Sign in with Facebook or

Name

Email Not published

Website

Comment

Post It

- 3 Replies
- 2 Comments
- 0 Tweets
- 0 Facebook
- 1 Pingback

Last reply was 1 week ago

1. Legalizing marijuana fails to solve problems in Uruguay | Broward County, Florida, USA
   View 1 week ago

   […] Legalizing marijuana fails to solve problems in Uruguay […]

   Reply

2. Herb Reese
   View 1 week ago

   Uruguay’s program has not even been fully implemented yet. Some of the requirements are ridiculous, like requiring to register.
   