The YAMANAS

According to Father Martin Gusinde's description work, the male natives were about 1.57 m tall, and women were between 10 and 12 cm shorter. They had short legs compared to the length of their trunk, and their arms were too long for the total size of their bodies. They were big-headed and had a wide short neck. Their noses were wide and snub, and they had a narrow forehead.

Their whole trunks were wide and the muscles of the chest were vigorously developed, especially women's because they were in charge of rowing.

Compared to this, their legs seem to be rachitic. Knees had deep lines because most of the time they adopted a crouching position, both on their canoes and in their huts, thus making a contrast with the muscles of their arms.

Their trunk was almost erect with no differences at the waist. They looked solid and, according to scientists, that is due to their adaptation to the environment, both for being canoeists and for their diet based on sealion fat and meat.

Their hands were coarse and small as well as their feet. They were brunets and their eyes were generally black, with Chinese-like features.
